Hello Texican Rangers

Have you heard - The Texican Rangers will resume their 2020 shooting season June 13th & 14th! The Texican Rangers board is making provisions to have a fun, safe shoot.

On Saturday May 23rd, I shot at the Green Mountain Regulators in Marbles Falls. It was very well run by club officers Lewie Ledslinger and Whiskey Kid. The Safety measures that were in effect for the match was spot on. Effective - not overboard. They had hand sanitizers available for all of the shooters at all of the stages, and 3 separate handwashing stations!

This coming Saturday there will be 5th Saturday matches at Green Mountain Regulators outside of Marble Falls, Texas Riviera Pistoleros in George West and at the Tejas Caballeros outside of Blanco.

The first Saturday in June have matches at the South Texas Pistoleros in San Antonio and the Plum Creek Shooting Society in Lockhart.

I suggest you check each club's website for details if you are planning on shooting any of these dates.

For the Texican Ranger match on the second weekend we will post on our web and email to our members the safety measures and items that we suggest you bring for the match.

We will have a workday June 9th. The targets are set and painted. We will be mowing and weed whacking, and general clean up!

A.D.

President, Texican Rangers

The Battle of Plum Creek

By Quintana

Following the Council House Fight, a group of Comanches led by the Penateka Comanche War Chief Buffalo Hump, warriors from his own band plus allies from various other Comanche bands, raided from West Texas all the way to the coast and the sea. These Comanches were angered by the events of the Council House, in which Texans had killed the Comanche Chiefs after the Texans had raised a white flag of truce.

The Comanche army comprised of warriors, women and boys totaling approximately 1000 people started south toward the level plains that fell away to the Gulf of Mexico. They passed San Antonio, raiding ranches and settlements along the way, until they reached Linnville at Lavaca Bay. They broke into John Linn's warehouse, loaded with goods waiting shipment to San Antonio. The Indians loaded all manner of merchandise onto horses and mules, now numbering in the thousands, and proceeded back north on a route that would take them to Plum Creek.

The men rode with women's parasols, stovepipe hats, ribbons and all kinds of goods stolen from the warehouse. The warriors rode in the lead with the horse herd and the women and children followed with the pack mules. Flankers were spread out along the column. The procession created towering clouds of dust. As they approached Plum Creek, they were met by an army of Texans who opened fire and charged. In the ensuing battle, more than 80 Comanches were killed, many were captured, and the rest scattered in all directions.

Buffalo Hump continued to raid white settlements until 1856, when he led his band into the Brazos River Reservation. The town of Linnville never recovered from the Great Raid, most of its residents moving to Port Lavaca, the new settlement established on the bay three- and one-half miles southwest by displaced Linnville residents.

Decorations Day, the Forerunner to Memorial Day

By Dutch Van Horn/Regulator 51153

On May 5, 1868, General John A. Logan, leader of an organization for Northern Civil War veterans, called for a nationwide day of remembrance later that month. He proclaimed, "The 30th of May 1868, is designated for the purpose of strewing with flowers, or otherwise decorating the graves of comrades who died in defense of their country during the late rebellion, and whose bodies now lie in almost every city, village and hamlet churchyard in the land." The date was chosen because it wasn't the anniversary of any particular battle.

On the first Decoration Day, General James Garfield made a speech at Arlington National Cemetery, and 5,000 participants decorated the graves of the 20,000 Union and Confederate soldiers buried there.

Many Northern states held similar commemorative events and reprised the tradition in subsequent years; by 1890 each one had made Decoration Day an official state holiday. Southern states, on the other hand, continued to honor their dead on separate days until after World War I.

By the late 19th century, many communities across the country had begun to celebrate Memorial Day, and after World War I, observers began to honor the dead of all of America's wars. In 1971, Congress declared Memorial Day a national holiday to be celebrated the last Monday in May.

Today even with the Pandemic, Memorial Day is celebrated at Arlington National Cemetery with a ceremony in which a small American flag is placed on each grave. It is customary for the president or vice president to give a speech honoring the contributions of the dead and to lay a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. More than 5,000 people attend the ceremony annually.

Old West Gunfights

By Dutch Van Horn/Regulator 51153

The modern-day misconception of "Old West gunfights." First off, it's not all the fault of Hollywood and the movies. Many years before cinema was even invented, dime novels were printed up, enthralling their eager and avid readers. These pulp novels were extremely popular and carried the written accounts of legendary Old West gunslingers Wyatt Earp, Doc Holliday, Wild Bill Hickok, Buffalo Bill, Bat Masterson, etc. The authors would simply dream up fictional accounts of the exploits of these famed heroes and embellish things that actually did happen.

It wasn't only the authors doing this embellishing, as many of the actual participants themselves would "color" their own stories for the sake of a good story. Newspapers, too, would dress up the tales of Old West gunmen in order to boost sales (no kidding? A newspaper not telling the truth? Gee, I'm mortified at that one!).

The fact is Old West gunfights were few and far between. In popular Western television shows like Bonanza, The Big Valley, Have, Will Travel, and Rawhide, the gunfight is a routine event, taking place about as often as we currently witness a politician being dishonest or your luggage being late coming on the carousel when you arrive at the airport. In some seasons of the longest-running Western TV series ever, Gunsmoke (1955-1975), a formal Hollywood gunfight takes place during the show's opening credits.

The typical Hollywood gunfight, in TV or in the movies, is two cowboys meeting on the street, usually about ten, twenty, or maybe twenty-five feet apart. They formally wait for one of the two to take a first shot. This signals that the fight is on and gives the second cowboy (almost inevitably the hero, the lead, the "good guy") the right to then draw. This second guy, also almost inevitably, wins the fight.

Actual facts (I know, this is a redundancy, but I wanted stress) about the Old West are tough to pin down. The following facts do appear to be true. Actual gunfights in the Old West were exceedingly rare. When they did occur, not one, but several gunshots were usually fired. Often onlookers were hit. And, no one knew who actually won the fight until several minutes after the gunshots, as it took a while for all the gun smoke to clear in the air.

Unlike in the movies, easy shots were often missed. Often the two just continued firing until they had completely emptied their pistols. Most experts on the Old West also agree, it was not the "fastest gun" who won. Most gunfights went to the more accurate shot. But even above speed and accuracy, a "cool head" took precedence and was the single most valuable asset for a gunman.

Although many Old West legends have "fast gun" reputations, it appears that John Wesley Hardin, Wild Bill Hickok, Doc Holliday, and Billy the Kid were actually really fast guns. But even famous "quick draws" didn't go the formal route in their gunfights. Why? It was still too risky for a "fast draw" or a "good guy" to lose.

Much more frequently than the typical Hollywood face-to-face draw, a cowboy would gun a guy down at the most opportune point. Meaning, if he got a drop on his enemy, if he was unarmed, or even if it meant shooting him in the back. The typical Hollywood gunfight distance too, was often varied. Sometimes two opposing gunmen would be very close and would circle each other, like caged animals, before opening fire on each other.

In 1865, in one of the few actual documented gunfights (with evidence and valid testimony), James Butler Hickok ("Wild Bill" Hickok) had a bad quarrel with Davis Tutt in Springfield, Missouri. The fight was over a debt. At around 6PM, the two advanced on each other in the town square. The men drew guns at a distance of around 50 yards and blasted away.

Tutt missed. Wild Bill didn't. Tutt fell with a bullet through his heart. Hickok was tried for manslaughter and acquitted. A sensational account of the gunfight appeared in Harper's magazine in 1867. This account made Hickok a national celebrity.

This fairly "Hollywood" gunfight, although it did occur, was a rarity. The 50-yard distance was questioned by skeptics but was verified by several onlookers.

Another "mistake" Hollywood makes about gunfights is the "gun in the holster" myth. True, gunfights were sometimes conducted with the opponents' guns in their respective holsters, but often the guns were held in belts or in their pockets, and sometimes just tucked into the front of their pants.

It was rare, but sometimes the two duelists would just stand up and face each other, each man clutching his gun in hand, no holster draw, no nothing. Oh, and there is one gunfight factor Hollywood did get right: "liquid courage." A great number of Old West gunfights were not the result of some noble cause, like "defending a woman's honor" or some such deal. The consumption of whiskey, liquor, and booze had a hand in a great percentage of shoot outs in the town square.

Still, despite knowledge of the truth, most of us enjoy a good TV or movie gunfight. They're dramatic, they're romantic, they're exciting, and I guess we like them because almost inevitably the good guy wins. And this isn't always so in real life, is it?

The Man with No Name Gun By Dutch Van Horn/Regulator 51153

The Man with No Name gun was Colt six-gun with the silver rattlesnakes on the grips. It first appeared in an episode of the TV western Rawhide, which starred Eric Fleming as Trial Boss Gil Faver and, a very young, Clint Eastwood as Segundo (second in command) Rowdy Yates.

It was the second episode of the series called “Incident at Alabaster Plain.” It aired on Jan. 16, 1959.

In the episode Rowdy acquired the gun. Guest star Mark Richman played Mastic, a vicious killer who challenged Rowdy to a gunfight. Faver intervened but in the end, Rowdy went after Mastic, who fled to the bell tower of a mission after robbing and murdering his stepfather. Faver yanked on the bell rope and the bell knocked Mystic out of the tower and he fell to his death. Faver retrieved Mastic’s Colt, which had the silver rattlesnakes on the grips, and gave it to Rowdy.

Clint Eastwood used the snake-handled Colt, a 5.5-inch barrel .45 for use with Hollywood 5-in-1 blanks, for the rest of the Rawhide series. When the series ended, Clint Eastwood kept the gun as a memento.

When Eastwood was hired to star in his first “Spaghetti Western,” A Fistful of Dollars, he used the snake-handled Colt with his personal Andy Anderson custom Walk-and-Draw rig. He continued to use the snake-handled Colt in For A Few Dollars More. The sterling silver rattlesnakes, coiled and ready to strike, were supplied on the custom grips by Andy Anderson of the North Hollywood Gunfighter shop. It is unknown who crafted the original snakes, but they were definitely professionally made by a silversmith.

And that is how an iconic handgun came about.
